Abstract

■ RESEARCH The use of a computerized system to monitor and control the ventilation of operating rooms can reduce the risk of infection, according to a study by researchers at the University of California, San Francisco. The system, called the "Ventilation Control System" (VCS), was designed to monitor and control the ventilation of operating rooms in real time. The system was used in a study of 10 operating rooms at the University of California, San Francisco. The study found that the VCS system reduced the risk of infection by 50% compared to the standard ventilation system. The system also reduced the risk of infection by 50% compared to the standard ventilation system. The system was used in a study of 10 operating rooms at the University of California, San Francisco. The study found that the VCS system reduced the risk of infection by 50% compared to the standard ventilation system. The system also reduced the risk of infection by 50% compared to the standard ventilation system.
